Details: Division 56 comprises clinicians, researchers, advocates, and policy makers. Our diversity, in expertise and in viewpoints, is our strength. Without doubt, diversity can create disagreement and conflict, which can be challenging. However, abundant personal, community-based and global examples prove that working through such challenges provides an opportunity through which growth and transformation, and increased cohesion, peace, well-being and effectiveness in reaching goals can be achieved.

Psychological Trauma: Theory, Research, Practice, and Policy (Impact Factor: 2.795) intends to publish a special section in early 2022 that will inform readers on the state of the science in collaborative and conciliatory models; provide examples of effective bidirectional collaborations between trauma research, practice, advocacy, and/or policy beyond the unidirectional translation of science into clinical practice; and offer a roadmap for researchers, clinicians, and policy advocates to more effectually achieve our shared goals of preventing trauma and decreasing its negative effects.

Relevant topics include: cost-benefit analysis of unidirectional (e.g., translation of science into practice) and bidirectional models of collaboration; examples of and/or methodological research regarding effective models of reconciliation, depolarizing communication, grassroots collaborations, and bidirectional models of collaboration between research, practice, advocacy and/or policy.

Empirical papers, meta-analyses, integrative reviews, methodological and theoretical papers will be considered. Authors considering submitting a paper are asked to read the journal's submission guidelines carefully. Invitation to submit to this special issue does not guarantee acceptance, and all papers will be subject to the usual peer review processes of the journal.
